Death embodied: Archaeological approaches to the treatment ... The choices made by past communities or individuals about how to cope with a dead body in all of its dynamic and constituent forms, and whether there was reason to treat it in a manner that singled it out (positively or negatively) as different from other human corpses, provide the stimulus for Death Embodied. The nine papers provide a series of theoretically informed, but not constrained, case studies which focus predominantly on the corporeal body in death.

Death embodied: Archaeological approaches to the treatment ... In the ritual practised in these monuments, a clear uncontroversial distinction can be made between life-centred rituals in the monuments constructed above ground (often called temples) (Figure 8.1A) and the death-centred rituals in monuments excavated underground (often called hypogea) (Figure 8.1B). However, this chapter proposes for the first time a debate over the nature of the embedded social structure behind the funerary practice.

Death embodied: Archaeological approaches to the treatment ... Drawing on archaeological evidence from the Veneto region in Italy in the Final Bronze and Iron Ages, the authors cite the following characteristics as some of the criteria for anomalous burials: inhumation in largely cremation cemeteries; displacement at the margins of formal burial areas; low energy expenditure or the adoption of simpler tomb structures; the absence of grave goods in inhumation burials; abnormal burial positions, especially prone burials; evidence of disability, deformity ...
