In Euripides, Pentheus believes himself to be the only man suitable to take up the fight with the god Dionysus, even if tough struggles await him. In verses 967–70, Dionysus hints to Pentheus with tragic irony (which is incomprehensible to Pentheus as he lacks divine knowledge) that he will be the cause

ANALYSIS. Euripides is interested not only in the nature of Dionysus but in the nature of religious belief itself, and so he provides a number of arguments both for and against worshipping the god. In Scene I the two old men articulate the wrong reasons for taking up the new religion: self-preservation and fear.
