Trade justice is a campaign by non-governmental organisations, plus efforts by other actors, to change the rules and practices of world trade in order to promote fairness. These organizations include consumer groups, trade unions, faith groups, aid agencies and environmental groups. The organizations campaigning for trade justice posit this concept in opposition to free trade, the advocates of which often also claim pro-poor outcomes. Trade justice advocates argue that truly free trade does not

Beyond mere trading (the selling and purchasing of goods), fair trade is a social justice movement that envisions a world in which trade practices work to reduce poverty and discrimination, consumers are empowered to make informed choices, and " everyone, through their work, can maintain a decent and dignified livelihood and develop their full human potential. "

Fair Trade: A Social Work Perspective - MSW Careers

Fairtrade has always had justice at its heart. We fight the injustices of global trade, where the power balance is too often uneven, leaving many farmers and workers in poverty. We are part of the trade justice movement, but to achieve justice for producers we need to look beyond just trade.
