Some play callers have the offense so well buttoned up in their memory that the situational approach might be better to reduce stress on the coach during times when a quick play call is critical. The past two seasons, partly because of our move to a wrist-coach based no-huddle offense , we went to a play caller that mirrored our wrist coaches (see above).

The NFL play call can be complicated to the untrained eye. However, as long as the viewer is able to decode what system the coach is using, it makes understanding the play call a bit easier. Often times, coaches will call 2 plays in the huddle, and the quarterback needs to run the play, or yell "kill kill" and go to the next play. This adds more variety for the coach and quarterback, however, the verbiage of the play call itself will often double in length.
