Historiography in the Twentieth Century: From Scientific ...

What is missing most from studies on the twentieth-century's preoccupations with history is an exploration of the inner and deeper connection and interrelation between the various experiences of the century and the various approaches to history. The twentieth century has been described as 'the age of extremes', as the century of catastrophic wars and genocides.

The 20th century saw the creation of a huge variety of historiographical approaches; one was Marc Bloch's focus on social history rather than traditional political history. The French Annales school radically changed the focus of historical research in France during the 20th century by stressing long-term social history, rather than political or diplomatic themes.

Historiography in the Twentieth Century falls squarely within this tradition. It is clearly based on the assumption that the historians it discusses were people who really existed and wrote what they wrote; it self-evidently rests on the belief that what they wrote mirrored their intentions; and it undoubtedly reflects the author's determination to tell their story as a coherent sequence of events.
