Summary Analysis Book 2, Chapter 1. Aristotle outlines two sorts of virtue —virtue of thought and virtue of character. The first arises mostly from teaching and requires experience and time to mature. The second results from habit. The Greek terms for both “character” and “habit” are actually the same word, ethos — hence, “ethics.” This sheds light on Aristotle’s insistence ...

He starts with the basics in Book 1: Humans are a higher form of animal, and animals respond to pleasure and pain. In Book 2, Section 3 he dismisses the misconception that virtuous people are “unaffected and undisturbed” by the desire to seek pleasure and avoid pain—they are still human. They still have desire and appetite.
