Paris to the Past. Author Ina Caro’s intriguing idea was “to travel by train through the history of France, taking day trips from central Paris … traveling in chronological order to a different century each day, and returning to Paris each evening.”. Dividing the book into the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, 17th-century France, 18th-century Paris, and Napoleon and the Restoration, the author visits from three to ten destinations for each era, devoting a chapter to each trip.

Thus any goods or passengers requiring transportation from Lyon to Clermont-Ferrand in 1860 needed to take a circuitous route via Paris of over seven hundred kilometers, even though a mere hundred and twenty kilometers separated the two cities. This centering on Paris led to inefficiency in the Franco-Prussian War (1870 - 1871). The Prusso-German railway lines, inter-connected in a grid-like fashion, proved far more efficient at advancing troops and supplies to the front than the French one.
