The air continues to be forced over the mountains and so it drops its

moisture as

relief rain.

Because

mountains get so

much rain,

they're great

sources of water, and

gravity

conveniently

takes that water

downhill in the form of rivers

Mountains and streams.

Often, mountain areas (like the Rocky Mountains)

feed rivers

(like the Colorado River) that provide the livelihood for heavily populated areas (like Arizona and Southern California).
