Science Monitor "The Artist's Reality. . . is a collection of 12 beautifully written and clearheaded essays from 1940-41. Addressing art in terms of tradition, myth, history, philosophy, form, politics, biology, and emotion, Rothko asserts the individuality and necessity of the artist, as he also reaffirms that the Abstract Expressionists were continuing an ancient tradition.

Mark Rothko ...

The philosophy of idealism has nothing to do with being idealistic. It has nothing to do with ideals, but rather ideas. It revolves around the thought that reality is fundamentally something that exists on a mental level. Kant once defined idealism as "the assertion that we can never be certain whether all of our putative outer experience is ...
