THE LONELY VOICE is based on lectures delivered by Frank O'Connor, one of the greatest exponents of the genre writing in the twentieth century, 'while teaching a master class in fiction writing at Stanford University in 1961.'. O'Connor devotes chapters to authors such as Turgenev, Maupassant, Chekhov, Hemingway and James Joyce (author of THE DEAD, one of my favourite short stories, contained in Joyce's first-rate collection DUBLINERS).

The Lonely Voice: A Study of the Short Story, first published in 1963, is comprised of the contents of these lectures. The Lonely Voice is, fundamentally, an attempt to nail down what a short story is and is not. In it O'Connor argues that "the conception of a short story as miniature art is inherently false," a notion as apropos today, in the era of microfiction and the 5,000-word submission limit, as it was in its own time.
