His best known work is his international best-selling memoir, The Philosopher and the Wolf, about the decade he spent living and travelling with a wolf. As Jonathan Derbyshire wrote in his Guardian review, "it is perhaps best described as the autobiography of an idea, or rather a set of related ideas, about the relationship between human and non-human animals."

A beautiful heart warming and heart rending true tale of one man's love of and life with a wolf, Brenin, from the time when the wolf was a six week old cub to his death eleven years later. For eleven years the two were virtually inseparable. Animal stories instinctively have an appeal and this is no exception.

living with a wolf and rambling on at times about philosophy, which made me want to skip ahead. I think this is a mostly true account, but it makes me realize some people (like this author) are dysfunctional members of society who rise to recognition and success in spite of themselves.
