to earth Abiku limbs.' meaning that earth is the only place where Abiku can grow, and that all the ritual being performed to make him stay is only but a waste. There is also the theme of vanity since no matter what man does to bribe death he must still die. His tone still expresses pride and lack of pity while his mood is a boastful one. Goats and coweries, palm-oil and sprinkled ash all symbolises the sacrificial element. No rime scheme.

A Comparative Analysis - JSTOR

The analysis reveals that, despite their monologic organization, the two poems appear as a dialogue between a parent-poet (Clark) and a rebellious child-poet (Soyinka). In particular, the mood and modality choices show some kind of power and hierarchy conflict between the parent and the child who considers himself as older than his parents.

Mood, Interpersonal and Ideological Meaning Patterns in the ...

The first, written by Wole Soyinka, is written in stanzas, while John Pepper Clark's is in block form. However, they also share a variety of qualities in common, such as nature imagery and belief in incarnation. One similarity between Soyinka's and Clark's poems is the belief in incarnation. Both discuss the Abiku, which is a young child who dies before reaching puberty and continues to haunt his mother after his passing.
