Documents show Marvin's leadership characterized by racist, anti-Semitic policies. In February 1935, members of the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan issued a letter to then-University President Cloyd Heck Marvin, thanking him for refusing admission to civil rights activist David Carliner. Marvin returned his own letter to the KKK, thanking them for their message and citing the need to free the University "from propaganda of all types".

Bergman's play was the auditorium's inaugural performance, and the venue at George Washington University was segregated at the request of its benefactor, Abram Lisner. Andrew Joseph Novak writes in a critical biography of Cloyd Heck Marvin, the university's president at the time. Marvin almost single-handedly transformed George Washington University from a sleepy commuter school to a proper university with a strong identity and influence on life in Washington.

Local Things Named for Appalling People: The Marvin Center —

Ellen Lord, the undersecretary for acquisition and sustainment, said that "adversarial capital" — investments from rival nations in U.S. companies that could block the DOD from working with them for national security reasons — is a threat that continues to worry her after initial warnings at the beginning of the pandemic. Lord previously also warned companies that already work with the ...

'Adversarial capital' remains a threat to defense —

Former University President Cloyd Heck Marvin firmly resisted until 1954, making GW the last university in D.C. to drop its racist admissions policy. The shadow of that past is cast over Foggy Bottom today as GW reaches out to diversify our student b ody and to make previously underrepresented minorities know that they should claim this space as their own as well.
