Vindolanda was not constantly occupied during the Roman period. Instead, forts were demolished and rebuilt according to the needs of the different cohorts occupying the site. At least nine different forts were built there. At times Vindolanda was a huge site, well-equipped with baths, luxurious quarters for its highest-ranked officers and supported by a civilian settlement outside the fort's ...

The Vindolanda tablets are made from birch, alder and oak that grew locally, in contrast to stylus tablets, another type of writing tablet used in Roman Britain, which were imported and made from non-native wood. The tablets are 0.25–3 mm thick with a typical size being 20 cm × 8 cm (7.9 in × 3.1 in) (the size of a modern postcard).

Vindolanda—Heart of Hadrian's Wall

Having visited Vindolanda and Hadrian's Wall, I thought I would give the novel a go, albeit that it isn't of my favourite genre. A good story line, and much impressive knowledge of Roman military matters. Remembering all the characters names and relationships was a little heavy going. But overall a good read.

At Vindolanda writing tablets have been discovered that are considered to be the oldest surviving handwritten documents in Britain. The messages are written on fragments of postcard sized wooden leaf made from locally grown birch, ash and oak. The ink was made from carbon mixed with gum Arabic and water. Like postcards from the past, the tablets allow a rare insight into the real lives of ...
